I remember one night when Al Palzar, a giant Minnesotan, appeared for the first time in New York fistic society. There was a momentary husb. Then every spectator turned to every other spectator and exclaimed: "Great Scott-what a face for a fighter!" Al Palzer certainly had the ideal "fighting face." His well rounded jaw was thrust forward like the ram of a battleship. There was firmness and courage in the lines of his mouth. His nose was short and not too prominent. His eyes were protected by high checkbones and the brow of a caveman. His neck was like a column, well set on broad and sloping shoulders that promised plenty of strength and bitting power. Palzer's eyes were clear blue, light, like those of his Viking ancestors, bold and steady. When fighting they held a

John L. Sullivan set the style in fighting faces for a generation or two. John had a heavy neck, a bold profile and a rounded, heavy, protruding jaw that gave him the fighting look of the buildog. Jim Corbett, who whipped him, was siender, clean-cut, and so ordinary in appearance that he'd have been lost anywhere in a group of college boys. Kearns, after losing to Willard, ran into a long string of defeats, and the first time that clevel and and New York have had such distinction since the founding of Ban Johnson's organization. The Indians continued their astonisms spurt yesterday by beating the Red Sox again and are gradually becoming obsessed with the data that nobody can lick them.

After taking the White Sox into camp a second time yesterday the yanks feel very much the same way. We shall see.

The farewell defeat of the White Sox added more evidence to the general belief that the Yanks have discovered in Mogridge, the southpaw, one of the best young pitchers of the last five or six years. He is yet to be defeated. It is not the record, however, that emphasizes his greatness. It is Mogridge's style and the remarkably small number of hits he yields to opponents. Against the White Sox yesterday he allowed but two safe blows, one of those a bunt and the other a fluke bounder that took away part of Peckinpaugh's thigh.

A most enthusastic advocate of the Gants is Germany Schaefer, assistant to Bill Donovan Last night he and the Vank manager were particularly delighted over McGraw's clean-up.

"When the Gants were losing," said Para-Schaefer. I watched them play a game here at the Polo Grounds, and I made the prediction then that they would win the National League championship and I still stick to it."
"I don't know of any club that can

It is interesting to note that a majority of the pitching stars that have loomed up this spring are southpaws. For instance, there are Cullop, Mog-son. He was sent in again yesterday and easily beat the Browns.

Those who are familiar with Topping's tournament record in the South during the last few seasons were not surprised to see the Greenwich man set going in the aftermoon at the expense of Frank Hoyt. A fifteen foot putt on the second green gave Toppins a 2 there, while a fine approach to No. 6 enabled him to sink his putt for a three. This hole is 360 yards.
